Coded Message Used By The Spies

On April 20, Wynne arrived on an official mission in London. Penkovsky had been in London for some time before Wynne's arrival. Wynne's assignment in London was to establish contact with Penkovsky and to deliver to him espionage materials. Wynne also acted as a courier for Penkovsky's communications with the British and American intelligence services.

He was given an assurance that after completing espionage on the territory of the USSR he would be given a responsible post in the British or American military establishments, at his own choice with a salary of 2,000 dollars and would also be paid a lump sum for his past espionage work on a 100,000-dollar-per-month basis. Penkovsky was introduced to a top official of the British intelligence service.

In July, 1952, Penkovsky, on two occasions, passed to Wynne packages with files and written reports and also discussed with him possible variants of his espionage and the cache, were taken from him during the arrest.

It was established during the investigation that one of the files was a classified memorandum of the British intelligence service. It was also that Penkovsky received from Chalkin a package with espionage materials and the cache, were taken from him during the arrest.
